What Changed

App is live, site now says so

Tank Care Buddy was approved and published to the App Store on August 17, 2026 (App Store ID 6788157041). Until this update the website still described the app as coming soon and offered a dead placeholder button, so anyone who arrived ready to download had nowhere to go. The hero eyebrow now reads “Now available on the App Store” and the placeholder is replaced with a real, working download link.

Official Apple download badge

Added Apple’s official “Download on the App Store” badge, used unmodified as Apple’s guidelines require, in two places: the hero and the bottom call-to-action banner. Both link to the live listing. The badge artwork includes Apple’s own light outline, so it stays clearly visible in dark mode without any alteration on our side.

New pricing section

The site previously said nothing at all about price, which is the first question most visitors have. A new pricing section sits between “Who it is for” and the social links, showing Free (one tank, every feature) beside Pro ($2.99 one time, unlimited tanks). The wording was taken directly from the app’s own paywall rather than written fresh, so the site and the app cannot drift apart.

Hero text was being washed out

This was a real bug that predates this update. The hero has a soft teal glow drawn behind it, but because the hero’s content had no stacking context of its own, that glow was actually painting on top of the words. Every line in the hero was rendering a washed-out grey even though the colour was set to near-black. Giving the hero content its own layer puts the glow back where it belongs, behind the text. The headline now reads at full contrast.

Alignment and spacing corrections

The centred pricing sub-headline was sitting noticeably left of centre because the shared section-sub style caps its width without centring the box; the fix is scoped so the left-aligned section headers elsewhere are untouched. The gap above the download button was also sized for the old dead placeholder and left the button floating away from the copy that sells it, so it was tightened. On a phone, the stacked pricing cards no longer pad out empty space above their footers.

FAQ and footer

The FAQ answers for “when can I download it” and “how much does it cost” were both still written for a pre-launch app; both now describe the live app and link to the real listing and the new pricing section. “Get the app” was added as the first item in the footer navigation on every page.

Files Touched

File	Change
app-store-badge.svg	New. Apple's official badge, downloaded from developer.apple.com and left unmodified.
index.html	Hero eyebrow, copy and badge; new pricing section; bottom CTA banner rebuilt; meta descriptions.
style.css	Hero stacking fix; ~160 new lines for the badge, pricing cards and fine print; spacing corrections.

shared.js	'Get the app' added as the first footer nav item.
support.html	Cache-busting version bump only.
privacy.html	Cache-busting version bump only.

Why It Changed

The website is the front door for an app that is now live and downloadable, and it was still presenting a product that visitors could not get. That is the most expensive kind of stale copy: it costs downloads from people who were already convinced. The pricing gap made it worse, because a visitor who could not find a price had to assume the worst. This update closes both gaps and, while checking the result, uncovered and fixed a pre-existing contrast bug that had been quietly weakening the headline on every visit.

Licensing Impact

None.

Apple's "Download on the App Store" badge is used under Apple's Marketing Resources and Identity Guidelines. The file is the official SVG from developer.apple.com, used unmodified and at Apple's minimum size, linking only to the Tank Care Buddy listing. No other third-party assets were added.

Deferred Items

- Two style rules are now unused: .btn-soon and .btn-appstore-white, left over from the pre-launch placeholder button. Harmless, but worth deleting in a small cleanup pass.
- 26 earlier website commits still have no changelog PDF of their own.
- Back up the signing certificates: export the Apple Distribution certificate as a .p12 file and copy it, with the app source, to the microSD card.

Recommended Next Step

Next

Correct the copyright line in App Store Connect. The live listing currently shows "© 2026 The Pop Umbrella" in its Information section, but Pop Umbrella is a social-media identity only and must not appear in legal text. Change it under App Store Connect → Tank Care Buddy → App Information → Copyright to "James Timothy Smith". Every file in the app source already carries the correct name, so this is the only place the wrong one is showing.
